While the construction may sound basic, every one of the various components for each part of the essay is very important. Since everybody needs to get an "A" on their paper, how about we investigate these parts inside and out.

Part 1: Introduction.

As an essay writer, it is not easy and simple enough to introduce the topic. The introduction is not simply about introducing your essay to all the readers, you have to make it attractive and catchy enough that people would want to know about the topic more.

In an introduction paragraph there are three major components to keep in mind:

1. Beginning with a hook
2. History or literature review about the topic
3. And a thesis statement

Hook:

A hook is technically the first sentence or couple of words that are eye-catching that anyone would stop and want to read the whole thing. It should be relevant, exciting, and interesting enough to bring in readers. You can be very creative when writing the perfect hook for your essay. It can be a quote, a story, some statistics, facts, a controversial statement, or even a little soft-tone joke. The purpose is to engage the audience from the very beginning and continue this till the end.

History:

In history, as the name suggests you tell the readers about the background of the topic. It will make them aware and clear on what exactly you're talking about, it also provides them with a reference to better understand the topic being discussed. Which helps them in better judging the arguments later in the essay. But the information in the background should not be biased. If the topic is contradicting then both sides must be presented.

Thesis statement:

The thesis statement works as a guide for the entire essay. A essay writing service can help you structure them but it is pretty simple to write on your own. The thesis statement serves as a mini-outline of the essay that gives the reader a gist of what is being discussed in a single sentence.

Part 2: Arguments

The argument is the main body of your essay. You'll use the thesis statement as your guide through this part and emphasize your arguments in great detail. Arguments need a key component and that is it should be backed by evidence. Scholarly arguments of other authors help strengthen your claims. You'll be using all the supportive data you can get. Here the key is to provide facts to back up what you're saying. Two sections need to be considered and not missed or ignored when writing the body.

Writer's Claims

The writer's claims are the pillars of an essay. They support your thesis statement with scholarly evidence and arguments with statistics and data and charts and diagrams. There can be more than one claim but each should be supported by evidence of previous research. Be careful not to share too much of other's work that yours gets lost somewhere in the middle of it all.

Evidence

It is the statistical part where many facts and figures are presented that the writemyessayfast.net's writer has researched about and that support his/her claims about the topic itself. But one should be very careful as to where and which sources are the data and stats taken from. If they aren't authentic. This can cause a lot of problems and put the credibility of the whole essay in jeopardy.

Part 3: Counter Argument

It is where arguments of counter opinions are presented. All the critics and clashes and claims that oppose the claim you are making in an essay. You must be thinking when why should I put in a counterargument? It is very important to write the discussions by different critics and scholars and authors. It shows wholesomeness about your literature and gives a more mature stance to it. Wait! Don't crumble!. This is the process that every writer has to go through it. Even, when I write my essay I make sure not to ignore any important detail in an argumentative essay.

Part 4: Rebuttal

Now after you're done mentioning all the criticism it's time to refute these claims. Here you challenge the counterargument, about the topic and try to prove to the readers that your claim or stance on the topic is solid and valid. You point out the flaws in the counterarguments, the weak points and change your reader's mind by presenting a more confident and correct claim. This part is all about convincing the reader that your argument is stronger than the counterarguments.

Part 5: Conclusion

Essentially, it is where authors rest the matter. Readers might have lost bearing with regards to the author's main goal are in every case high at the finish of an article. Hence, writers ought to remind the readers in the end part about the paper's unique goal. What ought to follow is an outline of the cases, including the author's argument, counterargument, and nullifications. Besides, researchers ought to be certain that their claim is correct regardless of opposite proof. Thus, the last conclusion should catch the author's closing idea. Here, students should offer readers a view of what might occur if their arguments are carried out. As such, they ought to talk about the practicality of their arguments.

If you simply follow these key basic five components in finishing up your essay and just have a stronghold over your thesis statement and try to make it interesting from beginning till end. For sure your essay writing will stand out from all the others
